Ain't No Makin' It is an ethnography following the lives of two groups of boys growing up in Clarendon Heights, a public housing development in Massachusetts. Jay MacLeod considers the differing aspirations of the two groups of boys: one composed primarily of blacks and one composed primarily of whites.

What, then, can educational reformers learn from Aint No Makin It? MacLeod offers few concrete suggestions, short of the transformation of the US into a “decentralized socialist economy” (pp. 262), about what can be done to alter the class structure that he so deftly describes as constraining the outcomes for the men in his study.
